

Obama should be able to speak

Patrick Weadon

Severna Park

Those urging the University of Notre Dame to rescind President Barack Obama's invitation to speak at graduation have very short memories. Then President George W. Bush spoke on the very same campus in 2001. He was ostensibly pro-life, but it is an undeniable fact that during his six years as chief executive of the state of Texas he presided over 152 executions, more than any other governor in the recent history of the United States. The Catholic Church is vehemently opposed to capital punishment, except in the gravest of circumstances.

President Obama may be wrong on the issue of abortion, but there is no evidence that he has ever procured one. Many of those who are currently protesting Obama's invitation said nary a word when Bush spoke at the South Bend campus.

From a Catholic perspective, there is no doubt that President Obama's refusal to protect the unborn is morally wrong; however, this should not disqualify him from speaking at one of our nation's most prominent Catholic institutions.